

Colorado 2024. 5 ½ days, 22 species

This is my first trip report, although I have been following the website for a few years. Even though I have been to several mammal watching hotspots throughout the world, I have not posted a trip report until now because my species counts always seem to be lower than everyone else's. This may be because I tend to travel on a budget, so I don't employ guides enough. I am also generally not very good at keeping mammal lists from trips and tend to retire for a beer come nightfall.

I went to a conference in Colorado last week (Annual Meeting of the American Society of Mammalogists, at UC Boulder), so I thought it would be a good opportunity to relieve my non-reporting guilt by making my first trip report! Although I did not see anything groundbreaking, perhaps this report can be useful for anyone planning a short trip to that state. Each day of the conference, just before sunrise, I would drive to mammal watching sites for a few hours and then, by late morning, I returned to the conference for the rest of the day. This made for a rather hectic schedule.

6/6: Flew into Denver and drove to the Betasso Preserve just outside of Boulder for a short evening hike. When driving into the preserve I saw a rabbit (not sure what species), and a couple of mule deer. There was also a red fox hanging around the parking lot, and a golden-mantled ground squirrel near the top of the short Bummer's rock trail.

6/7: The next day I drove to Rocky Mountain NP. I saw a Pair of Wapati (elk) by the road on the way in (near Pinewood Springs). In the park I saw two mule deer, three American pika at Rainbow Curve Overlook, Forest Canyon Overlook and near the Tundra Communities trailhead, and a few Yellow-bellied marmots at the Forest Canyon Overlook. On the Tundra Communities trail I saw what looked like fresh Mountain lion scat. I also saw an elk near sheep lakes and a bull Moose bathing in the lake. At the sheep lakes parking lot there is still an active Wyoming ground squirrel colony (a new species for me, thanks to the location tip from previous trip reports).

6/8: I drove to the Arapaho National Wildlife Refuge via the very scenic Route 14. On the way I stopped at the Moose Visitor Center near Gould. A lot of least chipmunks live around the bird feeders behind the visitor center, and at least one red squirrel. Just before arriving at the Arapaho Refuge auto route, I saw a couple of pronghorns, and in the auto route there were lots of white-tailed prairie dogs and Wyoming ground squirrels, as well as a white-tailed jackrabbit and, near the end of the auto route, a long-tailed weasel that had just caught its lunch.

6/9: Paint Mines Interpretive Park. I did not see thirteen-lined ground squirrels there. I looked in the places where a previous trip report (from June 2021) had described seeing them and I found their burrows, but no ground squirrels appeared to be home. I did see an Eastern cottontail and, on the way out, a mule deer and black-tailed prairie dogs. On the way back to Boulder I stopped at the Rocky Mountain Arsenal NP for more mule deer and prairie dogs, and a herd of Bison as well. The recently re-introduced Bison seem to be restricted to a limited part of the wildlife drive road, so seeing them did not feel like a natural wild animal experience.

6/10: On the way to Mount Blue Sky Recreation Area I saw a Golden-mantled ground squirrel. In the park there were a couple of pikas at the summit, several mountain goats and a couple of bighorn sheep at or near the summit, and yellow-bellied marmots everywhere. Later I saw a mountain cottontail in Boulder.

6/11: On the way to the airport, I stopped at the Rocky Mountain Arsenal National Wildlife Refuge again, where I saw lots of Black-tailed prairie dogs, several mountain cottontails, a bison, one white-tailed deer and a distant Coyote mother with three pups.
